Major indices sold off aggressively following a rapid increase in cases and fatalities of coronavirus. The main concern is that many countries will cease trade with China and temporarily shut down business in the country. The volatility from coronavirus fears completely overshadowed the FOMC decision to leave rates unchanged.

Bowser stocks (up 0.3% for the week) were green yet again in a volatile and bearish market. Surprisingly, small caps didn't underperform as a whole, which is usually the case when volatility spikes. CPS Technologies (CPSH) was this week's top gainer following news of a significant design win and initial order from a new customer. MamaMancini's (MMMB) also continued its bullish trend and hit a new 52-week high.

Company Headlines

- Monday: GSE Systems (GVP) refreshed its brand to help unify the market presence of its recently acquired businesses under the new name GSE Solutions™. MamaMancini's (MMMB) announced the appointment of Steven Burns as executive vice president. Where Food Comes From (WFCF) launched DairyCARE™, the latest offering in the Where Food Comes From CARE™ suite of sustainability standards.

- Friday: No significant news.

Bowser Notes

MamaMancini's (MMMB) shares continued higher following news of the appointment of Steven Burns as executive vice president. The stock has been showing relative strength since it announced new plant-based products and several new product placements. It is currently up 80% from our recommendation in April 2017 although it had already doubled in less than one year.

This run up from MMMB is a good reminder that you can always buy your favorite stocks back at a better price. If a growth stock loses market value but continues to grow, there's a high probability that investors will start to buy it back. MMMB shares dropped 82% and when growth picked back up, they tripled in less than a year.
